BACKGROUND:

Teachers in K-12 schools and faculty members at institutions of higher education often create instructional materials of their own design, such as videos, study guides, and illustrations, to supplement the standard materials in a curriculum. There is ambiguity as to the ownership rights to the intellectual property of teacher-created materials, as well as their commercial value, as the materials are created by teachers as part of their professional duties. Many employers have policies that specify ownership rights to intellectual property for materials created on the job.

Senate Bill 667 A requires school districts and community college districts to adopt and implement a policy at each school and community college that provides ownership rights to intellectual property created by teachers and faculty members, unless otherwise provided by written agreement, and prohibits districts from requiring teachers and faculty members to release ownership rights of intellectual property as a condition of employment.
