BACKGROUND: In 2006, the Workers' Compensation Division reviewed the role of podiatrists and concluded that changes needed to be made to existing workers' compensation statutes relating to podiatry. In 2007 the Legislative Assembly passed House Bill 2756, which fixed some of the problems for podiatrists, but also created others. For example prior to the reform legislation, Doctors of Podiatric Medicine (DPMs) were classified as attending physicians. In the two years prior to House Bill 2756, DPMs had a relatively low number of claims and had among the lowest cost per claim. Since the reform legislation, workers' compensation patients, who need the services of a podiatrist, have often been required to see two doctors, a DPM for treatment and a Medical Doctor or Osteopath as an attending physician. Proponents assert that this has added cost to the system as well as created a burden for patients and delayed care, slowing down recovery.

House Bill 2743-A restores DPMs as attending physicians within the Oregon's workers' compensation system.
