

SB 1568

Rebecca Roth

People are best served by a doctor-patient relationship where the govt is not dictating the standardized outcomes.

Obamacare dictates that if a person has been hospitalized + certain outcomes achieved, they must be sent home. A woman recently was admitted, brought to a point of stability + was then informed she had to leave. She knew that if she left the condition would return + refused to leave. The police were called to remove her from the premises. In the arrest she died in the parking lot.

Treating people like standard units and certain ^{threshold of} outcomes, doesn't account for the many needs of people.

Doctors who are essentially paid by the state as state workers and whose every action is controlled by the state, do not experience the commitment to people that a person who has entered the profession to care for people out of their love for people experience. The frustration of medically-trained people trying to care for the complex needs of sick people, ^{through state interference} translates into the actions that deny care. Too little time allotted, too few resources, too much standardization does not allow a person to "practice" medicine, but to simply give their required state-controlled time.

Socialized medicine does not work, has never worked and never will work, because people are individuals with complex needs.

Even in developed countries the people suffer if they are actually sick. The people of Canada have come over the border to access the care that has been available in American hospitals because of the "standardized" care, long waits, and unavailable personnel to help them. Innovation is destroyed and the advance of learning how to deal with complex disease conditions comes to a halt.
