BACKGROUND:

Resource and referral agencies, under the Office of Child Care, are responsible for providing information on child care providers to parents, providing technical assistance to existing and potential child care providers, and coordinating community resources. Examples of services include, helping parents to locate available child care during nontraditional work hours or explaining to providers of child care services how to license a child care center. The referral process must have 20 hours per week of telephone operation, including nontraditional hours and be in a convenient office space.

The early learning workforce has high turnover and low retention rates, which creates instability for children. Participation by child care providers in professional development is associated with higher retention and lower turnover, but there are barriers such as cost and time which makes pathways to certificates and degrees difficult. Child care resource and referral agencies are increasingly focusing on professional development for the early learning workforce. The Early Learning Division has contracted with 211info to provide centralized child care referrals, which provides callers with opportunity to obtain information on additional community resources.
