

Induced Demand

One of the most consistent findings in transportation research is the principal of induced demand: providing more roadway capacity in congested urban locations induces more trip-making and more driving, which automatically means more carbon pollution. The phenomenon is now so well documented that it's called "The Fundamental Law of Congestion." If we really care about climate change, the last thing we should be doing is building new or wider roads

Joe Cortright June 6, 2017