Rules Committee,

Because the Republican party has made it an issue to control Presidential elections by making rural areas more powerful than the more populous urban areas in every state, they have taken control of American policies by controlling the White House despite getting a minority of the popular vote. (As was the case in 2000 when George Bush won the electoral college while Al Gore won the popular vote.)

The electoral college has opened the door to 2 of the worst presidential candidates this country has ever seen. It's time to make the popular vote in Presidential elections the deciding factor for nominees to ensure that the majority of voters in this country are recognized when they cast their ballot for the candidate of their choice.
