BACKGROUND:

In the United States, sport and recreational activities are the third-leading cause of traumatic brain injury for children and adolescents, often a concussion. As a result of increasing national awareness, new guidelines and recommendations have emerged that seek to inform coaches, athletic trainers and teachers when a student should return to activities after a sports-related head injury. State and local government have enacted laws to govern return-to-play guidelines after a young athlete exhibits a concussion. Such laws often require an athlete to complete a medical evaluation by a qualified health care professional before returning to play.

Oregon law encourages each school district to provide training to individuals who train or instruct athletic teams (ORS 336.485). Senate Bill 217 adds chiropractic and naturopathic physicians to the definition of health professionals that can issue a medical release in Oregon.
