ISSUES DISCUSSED:

- Importance of social workers in Oregon schools
- Passage of legislation in 2015 that did not include social workers in list of professions

EFFECT OF AMENDMENT:

No amendment.

BACKGROUND:

Oregon school districts receive money for having one school in their district that provides trauma support services in the behavioral health services division for the purpose of decreasing absenteeism. The professions that qualify for school districts to receive money are school nurses, school counselors, school psychologists or clinical psychologists. Current law does not include social workers in the list of qualifying professions. Several Oregon school districts already employ social workers, including the Beaverton School District, Portland Public Schools and Reynolds School District. School districts like Tigard-Tualatin and Hillsboro use coordinator care positions to do several of the above listed professions.

House Bill 2648 amends the law to include social workers in the list of qualifying professions for behavioral health services by which school districts may receive money for decreasing absenteeism.
