BACKGROUND:

The due process clause of the United States Constitution prohibits the criminal prosecution of an incompetent defendant; a "defendant may not be put to trial unless he has sufficient present ability to consult with his lawyer with a reasonable degree of rational understanding ... and a rational as well as factual understanding of the proceedings against him." Cooper v. Oklahoma, 517 U.S. 348, 354 (1996). In Oregon, the process for determining the defendant's fitness for trial is commonly called the ability to 'aid and assist' and is described in ORS 161.360 to 161.370.

Pursuant to these statutes, a defendant may be subjected to a psychiatric or psychological examination conducted in a jail, locally in the community, or at a state mental hospital. When the examination results in a court order suspending the criminal proceeding until the defendant gains fitness for trial, the defendant may receive restorative mental health treatment in the community or at a state mental hospital. In some cases, a single defendant may be evaluated and treated numerous times at multiple locations.

Following a commitment to a state mental hospital for restorative treatment, the director of the facility is required to provide the court with regular progress reports. If, however, the defendant is committed for too long, or if the court determines that the defendant will never be restored to fitness, the court is required to dismiss the criminal case and may initiate civil commitment proceedings. By statute, a defendant who is unable to aid and assist may not be committed for restorative treatment for more than three years or for the length of the maximum sentence the defendant is facing, whichever is shorter.

House Bill 2308-C requires that each day the defendant is held in jail be counted against this maximum period of mental health services commitment, unless the defendant is charged with aggravated murder or specifically identified crimes with a mandatory minimum sentence.
