BACKGROUND:

The Randolph-Sheppard Act (Act) is a federal law that was enacted in 1936 in order to provide employment opportunities to people who are blind. The Act requires state rehabilitation agencies to recruit, train, license, and place individuals who are blind in positions operating vending facilities on federal properties, including vending facilities in cafeterias and snack bars, and automatic vending machines.

Oregon law requires state agencies to purchase certain products and services from the Commission for the Blind as part of the state's efforts to increase economic opportunities for the visually impaired. According to statute, the Commission is authorized to operate vending facilities in public buildings and properties with the approval of the relevant agency head. In addition, the Commission is also tasked with surveying public properties for determining suitability of vending facilities, in addition to training and licensing qualified blind staff for the facilities.

House Bill 3253-B expands and further defines the Commission's responsibilities regarding vending facilities and other services provided at public buildings and properties. The measure establishes priority for the Commission's Business Enterprise Program to operate vending machines, snack bars, micromarkets, cafés, convenience stores, espresso/coffee carts, and food trucks in facilities operated by counties, towns, cities, villages, and local governments.
