BACKGROUND:

In an effort to contain rising health expenditures, state and federal agencies have created programs designed to regulate provider payments and increase health care price transparency or disclosure of health costs as policy tools. Such tools include establishing large databases that collect health care data from insurers and hospitals, requiring public reporting of hospital prices and provider payments, or establishing state-based hospital rate-setting systems. For example, Maryland created an all-payer hospital rate-setting program, established in 1971 with a federal waiver, the only state to do so in the country. Maryland's Health Services Cost Review Commission serves as an independent state agency to authorize and establish hospital rates. Several other states have historically used hospital rate setting, but were limited to Medicaid or commercial insurers (i.e., non-Medicare payers).

In Oregon, HB 2009 (2009) created an all-payer all-claims database (APAC) that collects information on health care costs and spending in Oregon including hospitals costs. In 2015, SB 900 passed requiring the Oregon Health Authority to post hospital price information using APAC for the 50 most common inpatient procedures and 100 most common outpatient procedures on a website.
