In the Willamette valley people build on valuable agricultural land. In bend we build on lava rock but the same condensed building rules apply. Central Oregon, the fastest growing area in Oregon deserves space and access for an ever growing population. Wild and scenic? There are already homes there, why cut out a part of the population who want more access to available trails? How much wilderness do the environmentalists need? What about the people who live there? Is it only reserved for people of means? How about doing something for the people who want better access to existing trails or is this one of those NIMBY things? Keith Jensen, 2519 NW Locke Ct.
