Analysis:

The measure includes a number of modifications to public safety statutes, including:

- Directs the Attorney General to include a psychologist or psychiatrist with experience with batterers' intervention programs to be included on the advisory committee and modifies the standards for batterers' intervention programs.
- The measure also stipulates retention requirements for sexual assault forensic evidence kits by law enforcement and directs the Department of Justice to create informational materials for victims and medical assessment providers.
- Requires health care providers to share the medical records for persons under the jurisdiction of the Psychiatric Security Review Board (PSRB) with the Board.
- Allows a supervising entity, or its designee to issue an order for the return of a person found guilty except for insanity (GEI) and on conditional release to the state hospital or other designated facility. The order is to be executed by a peace officer unless otherwise provided.
- Modifies elements of, and exceptions to, crime involving unlawful operation of an unmanned aircraft system.

The -12 amendment modifies the Batterers' Intervention Program (BIP) advisory committee membership and specifies requirement for the BIP standards. The fiscal impact of the measure with the -12 amendment is anticipated to be minimal to the Department of Corrections, Department of Justice, Judicial Department, District Attorney's and their Deputies, and local law enforcement. There is no fiscal impact anticipated by the Public Defense Services Commission, Oregon State Police, Psychiatric Security Review Board, or Criminal Justice Commission.

The fiscal impact of the measure is indeterminate to the Oregon State Hospital (OSH). According to the Oregon Health Authority, the terminology within the measure allowing for the supervising entity's designee to issue an order for the return of a person to the state hospital may result in a higher recidivism rate to the hospital. Currently, OSH reports a recidivism rate for the GEI population overseen by PSRB to be about 20%. The number of individuals that may be returned to the state hospital through the provisions of this measure are unknown. According to PSRB, the intent of the measure is to allow for individuals that have absconded from supervision to be returned more expediently to the jurisdiction of the appropriate supervising entity by getting them to the state hospital or another facility designated by the supervising entity.
