

To whom it may concern:

Arguments are based on reason and not feelings, facts, and not problems of the past, nor future fears, and above all, laws are to be based on morals, rather than imagined future fictitious events.

Knowing the argument for the banning of selling puppies is based upon fearful feelings of imagined futures, I find that no argument, facts, nor reason can be brought to bear against such legislation, so I just have this to say:

Extrapolate fear and feeling based legislation, and you will see the end product of this country near to, or in line with socialistic and communist type countries. For the sole difference between a free country and a enslaved country is nothing else but fear. Fear of imagined loss of power, prestige, or imagined scenarios that may have happened in past times, but are of a irrelevant nature today.

If we make a precedent in the making of law based on a infinitesimal minority of criminal behavior, Extrapolation of such precedent leads to the same downward spiral of liberty loss and eventual destruction.

Also take into consideration that law dictates the following: All fall under US Law, except for One. There is only one publication that extensively speaks of the law and the exception to One, the denying of persons, and the fact that all US Laws are derivatives of the Ten Commandments. Thus in the knowing that such trade in living beings is done by the vast majority out of love, thus by One, of One, and for One, and would be considered the exception, rather than the rule.

Thank you,
Entered in this day for but a moment of enlightenment,
Richard Ritchey