As a coastal resident who lives adjacent to industrial tree farms I am dismayed that Oregon who is generally a leader in environmental policy is so behind with their forest practices. Given the toxicity of what is allowed to be sprayed near human residences and watersheds it is imperative that there be notice and data collected as to impact. Better yet stop allowing the aerial spraying of chemicals that other states sensibly banned. The allowing of this spraying may save the tree farm monies but the cost is born by human health, water quality, and the costs of the water districts which try to deal with the chemicals in the water they provide people to drink.

Thank you,
