BACKGROUND:

An employer wishing to employ anyone under the age of 18 must apply each year for a certificate to employ minors. One certificate applies to all locations where the employer may employ minors. On the request for a certificate, the employer estimates the number of minors to be employed throughout the year, lists the potential job duties, and identifies equipment and machinery the minors will use, and a general description of the business as well as the industry code, if known. There is no fee for the certificate to employ minors. If the application is approved, the validated certificate is mailed to the employer who must post a copy in each business location in a conspicuous place where employees may readily review it. The application review process does not inquire about character or fitness of the employer or employees who have direct contact with minor employees, nor does it allow the refusal to issue a certificate to employ minors based on known character or fitness issues.

House Bill 4113 requires an employer applying for a certificate to employ minors to attest that they and their employees who have direct contact with minor employees are not subject to report as sex offenders. The measure allows BOLI to inquire and investigate as to the character and fitness of the employer and any employee who has direct contact with minor employees. If information is revealed that contradicts the employer's signed attestation, the certificate can be denied or revoked and a civil penalty imposed. Minor employees are also given a private right of action if they claim they are aggrieved the employer's unlawful employment practice.
