Senate: Passed. Ayes, 28; Nays, 1--Heard; Excused, 1--Thatcher.

ISSUES DISCUSSED:

- Protecting privacy of individuals
- Test of necessity for disclosure
- History of address information release

EFFECT OF AMENDMENT:

No amendment.

BACKGROUND:

Government records are available to the public unless they are exempt from disclosure. Examples of records that may be protected from public disclosure include information about active litigation, trade secrets, investigative materials in criminal proceedings, electors' residential addresses, medical or other similar personal information, and the home addresses and dates of birth of public employees and volunteers. Some records are deemed exempt outright, and others may be disclosed if specified criteria are met.

Senate Bill 90 A adds the home addresses of certain persons with intellectual or developmental disabilities to the list of records that are protected from public disclosure, unless it is shown that disclosure is required in the public interest.
