Here are some points in favor of Ranked-Choice Voting. When more than two candidates are in a race, ranked-choice voting allows voters to vote their true choices without fear of splitting the vote. Campaigns are more positive because candidates know that it is to their advantage to appeal to a wide range of voters. The community ends up more satisfied with the election process because they get representatives that have support from a broad group of voters. With RCV, one election suffices. There is no need for both a primary and general election. The vote counting process results in an instant runoff and a winner with majority support. This saves money. I think voters and their communities will be well-served by Ranked Choice Voting.
