

To whom it may concern:

While cannabis operations may seem agricultural in nature much of the operations these days are little more than factories. Their use of chemicals, electricity and water seem to far exceed that of actual "farming". In my opinion, they have no place in rural areas with limited aquifers and emergency access. In short, if you have to create an environment other than the one provided by nature I do not believe you can call it a farm. There are more proper places to have such commercial operations where they can be properly taxed and served by government resources.

Thank you.

Darrel Boyd