

There has been an outpouring of needed support for multiple types of business and people this past year, but movie theaters have been largely forgotten. They are as important to this country as any other venue or entertainment option we have, but they don't have the option of takeout or delivery. Supporting theaters that have experienced an entire year of expenses but practically no revenue stream is a great step towards building up our economy once again. Not only are you supporting the arts and giving people a viable option to do something that was once a normal part of life, but you would be supporting other businesses in the process as well. What person doesn't immediately think a "date night" is dinner and a movie? People will be going out and supporting restaurants and theaters at the same time. People will need to feel normal again and watch stories with all sorts of experiences and adventures, and we desperately need to keep this options open as a place people can go.
