

I have attended Oregon Tech for about two years, and in my time as a student, upper administration has mattered very little to me. I have not thought of Dr. Nagi Naganathan as anything more than a figurehead, a signature on the bottom of those annoying little emails that I might give the courtesy of a skim through, or at the guy who took an entire student lab as his new office. Administration has made no discernible impact on me as a student, so I find the notion that they are the ones responsible for Oregon Tech's success as laughable. The foundation of Oregon Tech's success rests solely on the faculty that makes up the instructors, mentors, and advisors that better the lives of the students they assist. I am entirely indifferent to the people that make up the administration of Oregon Tech, other than a slight annoyance that they are attempting to take credit for the work that the faculty has done. My success, as a multiple time recipient of the president's list, is solely on the support and instruction I receive from my instructors. I am honestly appalled that they think so highly of themselves, while simultaneously denying a fair contract for those who do the actual work of Oregon Tech.
