Ranked choice is a far more accurate way to elect a candidate whose views most closely align with the will of the voters. Our current voting system is mathematically predisposed to elect extreme candidates. Ranked choice also means people can honestly vote for the candidate they support most without “throwing away their vote”. This gives candidates who better represent the will of the voters a better chance of winning elections, rather than the current system in which third party candidates simply split the vote away from candidates from one of the two major parties.
