Measure: SB3

I taught Spanish and speech and debate in the public and private school system for 8 years. A basic, yet core component of preparing students to be successful in the "adult" world that i always knew was missing from "core" curriculum was the skills needed to identify the type of job or career path that mattered to each young person and the hard skills they need to realistically pursue their different paths. I know I would have benefited from this explicit education, the students I taught would have benefited from this education, and future students are no different. Young adults deserve to be adequately prepared for the increasingly complex and difficult "adult" world we expect them to participate in, it's our responsibility to adequately prepare them; senate bill 3 helps to prepare them for just that.
