My boyfriend's granddaughter was struggling in school and her parents sent her to the Sylvan Center for help. They were so successful at helping her get up to her peers in school that when their second daughter had the same problems they sent her there also. If the Sylvan Center can teach kids to read what is the problem with public schools? Oregon isn't like southern states that spend so little on education yet Oregon is getting the same results. Why don't they look at the places that are actually helping kids that need extra help and do the same? You don't have to keep reinventing the wheel, just find out what works in successful schools.
