Measure: HB2005

After reading a decent sampling of the testimony on this bill, it's pretty clear that people opposed have a much better understanding of the subject than the supporters. That, in and of itself, should tell you all you need to know; the facts are simply not on the side of the bill. Among a vast array of uneducating rambling, there was testimony from the Columbia County District Attorney recounting a case in their jurisdiction where a felon was arrested in possession of ghost guns. Aside from the fact that it seems a little sketchy that a public servant is using their position to advocate for a political position, you have to laugh at the naivete; somehow-SOMEHOW!- making ghost guns illegal would have prevented a bad gun from possessing one.

But then, it's not about safety, is it? It's about control.
