As a resident of hood river Oregon seeing land lost to development is evident. Big new developments are clearing away native plants, orchards and single residences for large expensive homes and big development projects. They take away the farmland, open spaces and community connection once existed. Developers in hood river want less restrictions in rezoning so they can earn off the small people raising families, working the fields and connecting to the land and the few wild animals that roam these parts. Keep the farm zoning and keep nature alive.
