Anyone who sells one dog...

So what use is there in investigating a person who is, say, selling his grandfather's hunting dog after the owner's death, or when he realizes he has purchased a cute pup that is not a good fit in the household as an adult, or has to admit that his cats will not accept this canine?

Is there a state that has enacted and implemented a similar law, for a decade or so, which can give us some statistics on the benefit versus the long-term costs of such laws?
