Mail-in voting is wonderful and comes with a lot of benefits to voting. It not only allows for the ability for voters to pace themselves and study up on the topics and measures that are important to them, but also allows for additional time to research candidates and measures that are already worded in a way to confuse and manipulate the general public into thinking they are voting one way, but are actually voting another.

Changing the mail-in voting policy would negatively impact a significant number of voters and would likely result in decreased turnout. We should not be changing an established policy that has only helped voters gain accessibility to their rights just because one person doesn't "trust" the systems in place.
