Limiting voting to in-person only is a direct attack on the accessibility and fairness of our democratic process. Mail-in and drop-off voting are essential options that ensure working-class individuals, who often juggle long hours, multiple jobs, and family responsibilities, have the opportunity to make their voices heard. For many, getting to a polling place during designated hours is simply not feasible. If concerns about voter fraud exist, the solution is not to strip away these accessible voting methods but to implement stronger security measures at clerks' offices and improve verification processes. Punishing working people by removing their ability to vote conveniently is not only unjust but also undermines the fundamental principle of fair representation. Every eligible voter deserves the right to participate in our democracy, and restricting that right only serves to silence those who are already marginalized.
